MANAGEMENT KNOWLEDGE

CAN WE STOP TALKING ABOUT THE KNOWLEDGE MANAGEMENT NONSENSE PLEASE? KNOWLEDGE IS NOT POWER. THE ABILITY TO ACT ON KNOWLEDGE IS REAL POWER. The concept of knowledge management is purely an academic topic and has very little relevancy to the real world. When consultants start promoting it as if it is the central piece of strategy or organization, I have a problem with it. When companies are thinking to hire a Chief Knowledge Officer to do the job of managing knowledge, we should first consider Chief Culture Officer or Chief Common Sense Officer, Chief Foresight Officer, Chief Politics Bashing Officer or Chief Human Factor Officer. These are more practical.

WHY DO GREAT IDEAS TAKE SO LONG TO SPREAD?

Just because a new fact or idea seems right, doesn't mean it will spread like wildfire. Evolution, hand washing in hospitals, the inevitability that personal computers were the future of technology — none of these ideas were accepted immediately, even though they seem obvious today. Change takes time. But why?

BIG DATA IS NOT THE NEW OIL.

Every 14 minutes, somewhere in the world, an ad exec strides on stage with the same breathless declaration: "Data is the new oil!" It's exciting stuff for marketing types, and it's an easy equation: big data equals big oil, equals big profits. It must be a helpful metaphor to frame something that is not very well understood; I've heard it over and over and over again in the last two years.

IS A PICTURE REALLY WORTH A THOUSAND WORDS? IMAGES AND KNOWLEDGE MANAGEMENT

Before I explain the seemingly odd looking images in the photo below, I wanted to give my take on KM and innovation. Some would argue otherwise, but effective KM promotes innovation, by supporting diversity, encouraging new ideas and helping to seek out new approaches. This is still a fairly high level view and innovation, like other values could benefit from a helping hand. I thought it was time to blog about the experiences I've had of the use of images to inspire innovation and how they could help folk do things differently.

KNOWLEDGE MANAGEMENT: A QUESTION OF TRUST

At a recent conference, one participant described knowledge management as 'the conscience of the organisation' and that 'effective knowledge management depends on a sense and a synergy of moral obligation by employer and employee'. For me the key element in this employer-employee relationship is trust. From experience, knowledge management thrives in organisations where there are high levels of trust between people within the organisation.

MANAGEMENT INNOVATION

THE KEY MISTAKE UNDERMINING YOUR PITCH.

Over 90 minutes into the meeting, the frustration boiled over into anger. The product manager, who had come up with what he thought was an airtight, iron-clad, compelling and irrefutable business case for launching a fairly clever innovation, completely failed to persuade the impassive CMO. The CMO, who didn't "own" the product line but was responsible for brand and strategic positioning, said that he understood the value proposition but felt it blurred the "premium" positioning he wanted that product to have. He wouldn't approve any further development.

THE BEST MOTIVATION FOR INNOVATION IS 'BEING IN FLOW'. An important topic in Innovation Management is that of motivation. What kind of incentives can an organization provide to stimulate innovation? Bengt Järrehult argues that there is no such thing as extrinsic motivation and we should really concern ourselves with working in Flow.
